

There should be an under 25 tax scheme that contributes towards students and young adults to pay for their education and set up their life free from means testing of parent income. Provide this demographic with the means to begin life on solid ground and this is an investment in all future growth.

- all part time work for under 25's should be taxed at a lower rate
- all other part time work i.e. second and third jobs, should also be taxed at the same low rate as the first job

This approach would

- encourage all young people under 25 to achieve self-financed independence, partially fund their education, live (food +rent+transport+tools+books+communication)
- provide security in turbulent times of high unemployment and business failure i.e. provides for situation in which they are not dependent on one job.
- better to tax income earned at a lower rate than pay out government pensions and unemployment benefits as this provides for growth of individual ability

Carolyn Bailey