

Dear Sir/Madam

I have read recently that there is a "strong chance" that the current dividend imputation system could be abolished and/or diminished.

This was a very important initiative that was introduced by a previous labour government and I am absolutely astonished that there is even talk of it being abolished particularly as the government purports to be trying to help people coming into their retirement years.

I am one of those majority of people who have never written a letter to any government department before, and I have never openly protested about anything, however if this rumour starts to spread further and there is actually some chance of it being introduced then I shall make it a "quest" of mine to ensure that every single person, and in particular every single one of our "grey brigade" in Australia, is fully aware of the ramifications because, as I am sure that your are aware, there are many "recipients" of this scheme that do not fully understand the mechanisms and certainly would not be aware of the ramifications if it was abolished.

I look forward to your response to this e-mail with interest.

Thank you

Bill Guthrie

[removed for privacy reasons]